Editorial

We are very happy to publish this book on Good Governance (Principles & Practice). All the professors and researchers have made a concerted effort to clarify the contemporary context of Good Governance through various perspectives on the occasion of 75th Year of India's Independence Day and Good Governance Day (25th December - 2021). An honest effort has been made in co-operation with the professors and researchers to analyze and explicate their views in context with the good governance which has been a boon for the implementation of transparent governance through the present editorial book.

Good governance means clean governance - clean administration. Good governance means that there will be no place for fear, exploitation and corruption in such a system of governance. In short, good governance will be free from administrative corruption. At the same time there will be transparency in the administration and a sense of generous responsibility towards the people. Scientific administrative principles will be the basis of good governance. The unity of order will be a good arrangement for the Hierarchy tradition, control room, recruitment, training and promotion etc. In administration, along with self-governance and morale, there will be good relations between officers and employees. David Osborne and Ted Gambler envision government as an alternative to entrepreneurial government.

According to the World Bank, apart from democratic transparency and accountability in good governance, it can also be said that good governance relates to such individuals and their work that represents the people. In addition to meeting their basic needs, they serve them well and solve their problems. For the establishment of good governance, the government and the administration must provide the right to information to the people. Good governance cannot be established without the presence of intelligent citizens. This will curb corruption and make the government and administrative system accountable to the people. With the establishment of good governance, e-governance based governance will create closer ties between the citizens and the government.

The contributions of the professors, researchers and authors who have contributed to Good Governance (Principles & Practice) are invaluable. We feel it is our duty to express our gratitude to them. The publication of this book has been facilitated due to the untiring efforts of our friend Prof. Virag S. Gawande Sir, Director, Aadhar Publications, Amravati. A heartfelt thanks to all the distinguished professors, researchers and loved ones who have contributed to the publication of this book.
